Bedouin women for all they are slaves in name to their husbands, come nearer feminist ideals than American women, is an interesting statement by Margaret Simpich, who, with her husband, toured Asiatic Turkey for the National Geographic Magazine. The account of their travels appear in the December issue of the magazine, from which the following story of the desert women is taken.

Righteousness Br Law. To The Editor of The World:

In your yesterday's leader, "Drink and Despotism," you wax eloquen in your contention that in the hal eyon days of Democracy, National Prohibition would have been thought a joke, and properly-first, because "Democrats did not believe in making men righteous by law:" second, be cause "Democrats believed in personal liberty:" third, because Democrats believed "that in all matters personal, domestic and social, regulation should be liberal." And we wish it

May I ask you, then, first, what of making men righteons is through the physical, mental and moral edu cation of individuals, that does not mean that the correction by law of
